Spring Brings Changes for The Southwesterner

You are holding in your hand the end result of many hours of discussion in our end of Christy Administration Building. The Southwesterner has been something of a stable commodity for the past decade or so. For at least that long, it’s reached your mailbox four times a year, in an oversized format that let us use big pictures and bold graphics to convey the emotions and relationships that are at the core of the Southwestern connection.

But the spring issue, we admit, has tended to be a bit anemic. We don’t have an event around which to anchor the periodical, and winter is not the most spectacularly beautiful time on campus. So we’ve decided to make a change.

Beginning with this issue, the spring Southwesterner will arrive in a newsletter format. It will still contain alumni notes to help you keep up with your classmates, stories about student achievements and interesting alumni, and news that will make you proud to be a Builder. While it won’t have complete photo spreads (as we’ll continue to have for the fall, winter, and summer issues), it will continue to be designed by our award-winning graphic designer.

Besides giving some variety to our look, the new spring format will save money on printing and postage, and let us explore other communication options. By next year, when we use this format again, we may have tweaked a few details, but so far we’re pleased with this experiment.

What do you think?

KCAC Champs: Cut Down the Nets!

The 100th season of basketball was a year for the record books for the Builder men’s team. When this issue of The Southwesterner went to print, the team was headed for the national NAIA tournament March 8-14 in Point Lookout, Mo.

Coach Doug Hall’s squad headed into post-season tournament play as KCAC champions (15-3 record), and had been ranked as high as number five in the national NAIA polls with a regular-season record of 25-3. This was the first Builder basketball league championship since 1992, and turned around a squad that went 3-26 the year before Hall became head coach in 2001.

Moons Shine at KC-ACTF

Since the early 1990s Allyson has worked extensively with creativity theory and gaming which has led to an active pursuit of theatre across the disciplines, improvisational acting, and theatre arts advocacy. Results of this ongoing work have been the subject of several workshops in the region, the development of new classes, and Southwestern’s 9 Lives Improvisational Comedy Troupe.

Both Allyson and Roger were instrumental in the achievements of the long-running Horsefeathers and Applesauce Summer Dinner Theatre (Allyson as managing director and Roger as director, designer, actor, and tech) and now are board members of Marquee, Inc., a non-profit organization that owns and manages a regional performing arts center.

The Region V festival also marked the second time during the Moons’ tenure at Southwestern that a Campus Players-produced play has been selected for presentation. 10.10.POST.9.11: Laughter in the Aftermath was written by student Adam Sharp, and was one of only nine plays chosen from 193 eligible.

“‘This is an honor of incredible proportion,’” Roger Moon says. “‘Our goal is to educate students and at the same time to provide the highest quality theatre for our community. To be recognized for the quality of our theatre within our eight-state region, which is one of the most formidable regions in the KCACTF, shows the quality of the students and education we have here at Southwestern College.’”

A Kinder Cut

A class of 23 junior-level students at SC comprises a wide variety of shapes, sizes, skin hues, and genders. The group is always surprised, though, to discover they’re not the same under the skin. “Everyone is as different internally as they are externally,” says Dr. Pat Ross (center), instructor of the Cadaver Dissection course. In the past four years, for example, students have discovered bodies with two or four branches of the arch of the aorta rather than the typical three. Southwestern’s commitment to the cadaver lab has implications for the remainder of the biology program—students separate and present the tissues and organs for use in the 200-level Human Anatomy and Physiology course.

Costuming is serious business, as freshman Courtney Eck and junior Trish Roudybush discovered when Southwestern College students and alumni participated in Wichita Grand Opera’s production of Lucia di Lammermoor Jan. 21.

The 21 students and seven SC alumni were members of the opera’s chorus, directed by SC director of choirs David Gardner.

“Seeing how the professional singers approach their craft was a great benefit for our students. I believe many of them learned more about their own voices during these intensive two weeks than they might in an entire semester of private voice lessons,” Gardner says.

You probably remember the moment you officially became a Moundbuilder. You had already enrolled for classes, and moved into your room, and maybe even attended a lecture or two. But then, on a hot, late-summer evening, cheered on by classmates and professors, you lobbed a piece of rock bearing your name onto the Mound. You were a Moundbuilder.

Today you can reaffirm your allegiance to Southwestern College by participating in the Heart of the Hill Campaign - Phase 2. Along with a drive to plant trees on campus, the campaign will rebuild the crumbling Mound and make its surroundings a focal point of the campus.

Honor your time at SC, or a classmate or favorite professor, with an engraved brick or paver. Contact Jessica Hornbostel at (800) 846-1543, ext. 6155 or jhornbos@sckans.edu for more details.
